X64 Incl Keygen-Lz0 In the final days of the campaign, the Liberals are attacking the NDP for being in favour of taxpayer funded public education. The claim: In an election debate aired on Oct. 12, New Democrat Leader Thomas Mulcair said, "I voted to fund public education as long as it was not a cash cow for organized labour." The NDP's public education program has been in place since 1968, and Mulcair's position on funding public education is well known. In 1968, public education was "the cash cow for organized labour," as Mulcair said in the Oct. 12 election debate. (Canadian Press) When public education was the cash cow In 1968, Saskatchewan Premier and Confederation solider Tommy Douglas promised his province would "set up a system of free public schools" for Saskatchewan citizens, but he knew the federal government would have to fund it if he didn't. So he proposed that — in addition to spending on health care, unemployment insurance, pension programs and other provincial programs — Saskatchewan would receive 25 cents per person per day. The NDP said it would set aside the dollars "for the development of education and culture," and the Liberals said it was "a token amount." But Alberta premier and former Saskatchewan premier Ernest Manning, said that 25 cents per person per day would be "a bad deal for the federal government, a bad deal for Saskatchewan and a bad deal for you, the taxpayer." Manning said if Saskatchewan took a percentage of its public funds to support public education and not the federal government, "you will have a national public education system and you'll have a national public education problem." The federal government would have to pay 25 cents per day for education in the provinces. (Northcote Archives) When the federal government came along, it didn't follow Manning's advice. It funded the programs and provinces paid their part, up to an agreed upon level. In an Oct. 12 debate in French in Quebec's Gaspésie region, Mulcair reiterated the NDP's position on funding public education. "We voted to support public education because it is the right of all citizens," he said in French.
